“The remaining hope lies in public law schools that continue to embrace the mission of providing a quality education at a lower cost. . . . There are many excellent state law schools that continue to charge well below $20,000. North Carolina . . . and a few more fall into this category. These schools have resisted the distorting pull of U.S. News competition, secure in their position as flagship state schools with a strong presence in the local legal market. . . . Affordable public schools are the final sensible corner of legal academia. The biggest threat to their existence is a withdrawal of public subsidies. . . .”
